1. In January 1952, the Chinese Communists completed an airfield at Yukuoohan (裕國站) under the command of the Mukden Air Force Headquarters. Each runway at this field is 7,000 yards¹ long; a total of 11 hangars are above and below the ground; one taxi strip leads to underground hangars; and 3 of the 7 oil tanks are underground.
2. In January airfields at Palirmu (122-20, 48-19) Huilaerh (呼拉尔), Nench'eng (嫩城), and Sungp'u (126-36, 45-52) were being reconstructed under the command of the Harbin Air Force Headquarters.²
3. In January, Fuyu (124-49, 45-11) Airfield was being reconstructed as a base for 100 planes by the Changchun Air Force Headquarters.
4. In January airfields at Mengkuli (130-28, 46-51), Aihun (127-28, 49-59),² Fuchin (131-59, 47-14), Hulin (133-38, 45-59), P'ingt'i (平堤),² and Foshan (130-30, 48-39) were under the Chiamussu Air Force Headquarters. The Chinese Communist Air Force was training pilots at Mengkuli Airfield.
5. As of March, flights of three to five Chinese Communist planes, piloted by Soviets under the command of Major T'a-min-to-fu (塔民多夫), were flying daily from Hangwan³ Airfield over the Shanghai, Paoshan (121-31, 31-26) and Wusung (121-31, 31-23) areas.
6. In February Chinese Communists completed reconstruction at Anshan (122-57, 41-04) Airfield. This field has two main runways, each 1,800 yards long; 8 underground oil dumps, each 30 feet deep; 2 warehouses; 4 searchlights; 4 anti-aircraft guns positions; one radio station; and some radar equipment.

7. During the summer of 1951, Anshan Airfield was designated Soviet Air Force Base Number 174. In early March 1952, Soviets were responsible for security at this field. With the exception of jet pilots, no Chinese Communists are allowed on the field. In early March, two battalions of Chinese Communist troops were outside the field. From 20 to 30 planes took off each day, flying in the direction of Antung.

25X1 1. [] Comment. Probably "feet" is meant.

25X1 2. [] Comment. This office has no information on airfields at these locations.

25X1 3. [] Comment. Possibly Kiangwan is intended.
